Frankie...

I came back to the reality of hearing one of my favorite Beatle tunes start up. The three girls next to me squealed and started cheering and swaying back and forth in their chairs. One of our old friends sitting behind us, Mike, got up and grabbing Jackie's hand took her out to the lonely dance floor. They danced and he held her hands pulling her up, pushing her back, twirling her out and bringing her back in. She laughed and smiled, her long blonde hair swishing in rhythm with the music. They dropped hands and just started dancing. Jackie, like her mom, is a great dancer. She turned to her friends in their chairs, "C'mon, you guys, get up!! Get out here! I love this song!" I smiled at her proudly as us emiscing aunts do. There was Frankie standing again before me, dancing in Anchor Café like I had watched her do so many, many years ago. Dancing, laughing, talking, motioning for people to get up and party with her.

The dance ended and Jackie and Mike hugged briefly and then went to sit back down. Mike sat behind me and I turned and our eyes said what we were both feeling. Jackie sat down next to me taking a drink of her coke and laughing with her friends. "That was great! "You looked just like your mom out there Jack!", I said almost yelling it into her ear over the band's music. "I did! Cool! I miss her being here, Aunt Caryn." "I do too Jack, but something tells me that she is here with us now." I said pushing her hair back from her face. Jackie nodded in agreement. The band started another number and Jackie put down her coke quickly and turned to her friends, "Ok, this time you guys gotta get up. C'mon, let's go."

I looked behind me at Mike and winked. He smiled and winked back. We toasted without speaking but knowing that we were both thinking the same thing at the same time, "Here's to you, Frankie. Your legacy still lives on."
